NINTH REPORT OF THE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

PRIVATE MILITARY COMPANIES

SESSION 2001–2002

RESPONSE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

1. The Government welcomes this important and thorough report from the Foreign Affairs Committee and has taken careful note of it.

2. The Government welcomes the Committee's positive assessment of the Government's Green Paper on "Private Military Companies: Options for Regulation". It notes the Committee's judgement that "such companies have the potential to make a legitimate and valuable contribution to international security. The challenge of regulation is therefore not only to prevent PMCs from inflicting damage, but also to establish how the Government should work with them to maximise the benefits that a properly regulated private military sector can bring" (paragraph 4).

3. The Consultation period on the February 2002 Green Paper "Private Military Companies" (PMCs) ended on 12 August. There were a total of 39 responses: 16 from Companies and Trade Associations, 6 from NGOs, 7 from academics, 3 from Members of Parliament and 7 others. A list is attached at Annex A. As part of the Consultation process, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department for International Development sponsored a Seminar at the Centre for Studies in Security and Diplomacy at the University of Birmingham on 24 June 2002. There was widespread support in responses to the Consultation, including from a number of PMCs, for some regulation. Options proposed ranged from prohibition of all military activity to self-regulation.

4. Contributors raised a number of key concerns about policy towards PMCs, including:
 - the risk of damage to legitimate security-related business interests by over-regulation. Some contributors argued against regulation on these grounds, and on the grounds that regulation might be complex and expensive.
 - possible threats to human rights, national sovereignty and development in poor countries from the activities of PMCs
 - lack of transparency and accountability in the sector, including links to other businesses, in particular extractive industries

5. Contributors also identified potential benefits from legitimate PMC activity, such as:
 - assistance to weak but legitimate governments in establishing the security needed for development
 - provision of services of direct social and economic benefit, such as de-mining
 - assistance to the UN in peacekeeping
 - protection of legitimate commercial and NGO activity in dangerous areas
 - raising the professional standards of local armed forces
 - economic benefits to UK businesses

6. The Government considers that the case that has been put forward, in particular by the Foreign Affairs Committee, for Regulation of PMCs needs careful further consideration. The Green Paper Consultation and the Committee's Report have made clear that the question of regulation raises complex policy issues. They include:

- the balance of advantage between regulation and allowing companies to conduct legitimate business of economic benefit to the UK without undue hindrance
- whether any activities should be prohibited, and how heavy any regulation should be for those permitted
- the form of any regulation, who should be responsible for it, and how it would be paid for
- defining who and what might be covered
- the compatibility of any regulatory system with EU and International Law
- addressing concerns about the transparency, probity and attitude to human rights of PMCs
- minimising the risk that any regulatory regime would be seen as the UK endorsing undesirable activities.

7. In addition, the Committee, and a number of contributors to the Consultation, have drawn attention to the experience of the United States and other Governments in regulating Private Military Companies. The views and experiences of international institutions such as the United Nations and the European Union are clearly also of importance. The Government therefore proposes to seek further information on these as part of its further consideration of the issues, before taking any view on the way forward.

Recommendations

Existing Regulatory Measures

- (a) We conclude that the lack of centrally held information on contracts between Government Departments and private military companies is unacceptable. We recommend that the Government take immediate steps to collect such information and to update it regularly. We further recommend that in its response to this Report the Government publish a comprehensive list of current contracts between Government Departments and private military companies and private security companies, and provides the information requested by the Committee in the Chairman's letter of 18 June to Denis MacShane, which is reproduced in full at page Ev.44 (paragraph 17).

The Government agrees with the Committee on the value of such information. Attached at Annex B is a list of current contracts overseas with private military and security companies known to Foreign and Commonwealth Office posts.

The Department for International Development (DFID) has no contracts with private military companies. A survey has been undertaken of the DFID offices overseas to see whether any have contracts with private security companies for the provision of post security separate to that provided under FCO contracts. The outcome of the survey is included at Annex B.

It has not been possible in the time available to collect similar information for the Ministry of Defence given the very broad spectrum of activities, including logistics support, training, maintenance, catering and accommodation for which the Ministry of Defence lets contracts. Such contracts are let by all three Services for all types of deployment, from UN mandated peace support, peacekeeping and enforcement, to exercises and training. Considerable work would be required to define and identify the contracts which might fall under the Committee's request.

- (b) We recommend that the Government, as it considers national regulatory measures, also develop a new draft international convention to regulate PMCs which might replace the existing UN Convention against the Recruitment, Use, Financing and Training of Mercenaries (paragraph 25).

The Government agrees that the UN Convention is unlikely to provide a workable basis for regulation, but does not believe that there is any realistic prospect of developing a replacement for the time being. The Government will continue to develop UK policy.

- (c) We recommend that, in considering options for regulation, the Government examine carefully the United States government's regime for regulating and monitoring the activities of private military companies (paragraph 28).

The Government notes that the Green Paper draws attention to the United States legislation, and will examine the experience of the United States and other governments, such as South Africa, in more detail as consideration of the issues continues.

- (d) We recommend that the Government work with European partners towards including the services provided by PMCs in the existing EU Code of Conduct for Arms Exports (paragraph 30).

The Government agrees that there will be value in promoting a common EU approach to PMCs. It will initiate consultation with EU partners and report to the Committee.

The debate on Private Military Companies

- (e) We recommend that, before bringing forward legislation to regulate PMCs, the Government consider how to deal with the possible involvement of these companies in the overthrow of established states (paragraph 50).

The Government will consider this.

- (f) Although the services provided by PMCs will not by themselves solve underlying problems in unstable countries, we conclude that the employment of professional, responsible and well regulated PMCs could, in some circumstances, contribute to the establishment or maintenance of relative stability, under which lasting solutions to such problems might be worked out. We further conclude that PMCs may have a legitimate role to play in helping weak governments to secure revenue streams, for example by protecting border points and highways (paragraph 67).

The Government agrees that PMCs have the potential in some circumstances to play a positive role.

- (g) We recommend that the Government prohibit private military or security companies from using names similar to those of British regiments or fighting units, or from the use of any emblem, symbol or distinctive item of uniform similar to those of the British armed forces (paragraph 71).

The Government considers that there is a case for prohibiting private military companies from adopting names, logos or other appearances that imitate those of the Armed Forces.

Potential benefits of a regulated private military sector

- (h) We conclude that the Government should consider carefully whether the greater use of PMCs in UK humanitarian and peace support operations might help to reduce military over-stretch (paragraph 101).

The Ministry of Defence let contracts with private companies where appropriate to support a wide variety of deployed commitments, including peacekeeping and humanitarian operations. These contracts are primarily for logistical support, including troop deployment, food supply and maintenance of accommodation and equipment. The availability of reputable companies to provide such support means that the UK may be in a better position than might otherwise be the case to respond positively to requests to take part in such operations.

The Government sees no difficulty of principle in private companies offering support to humanitarian or peacekeeping missions directly to the UN or to other international bodies that mandate or co-ordinate such missions. But when the UN formally requests the Government to contribute to such operations, it does so in the expectation that the front-line tasks will be undertaken by the UK's Armed Forces, with their known skills and experience. The Government would therefore not consider it appropriate for the UK to agree to undertake such tasks and then, as it were, to sub contract them to private companies. If the existence of other commitments meant that the Armed Forces were not able to undertake new peacekeeping or other humanitarian operations themselves, the Government considers that it would be preferable to decline the mission at the outset.

Options for Regulation

- (i) We conclude that an outright ban on all military activity abroad by private military companies would be counterproductive (paragraph 102).

The Government agrees.

- (j) Though the Green Paper argues that “the distinction between combat and non-combat activities is often artificial,” we conclude that such a distinction can and should be drawn for the purposes of regulation. We do not underestimate the difficulties inherent in this process (paragraph 107).

The Government agrees that a workable distinction would be an important element of any regulatory regime in spite of the difficulty of drawing one up.

- (k) We recommend that private military companies be expressly prohibited from direct participation in armed combat operations, and that firearms should only be carried — and if necessary, used — by company employees for purposes of training or self-defence (paragraph 108).

The Government will consider this carefully. As the Committee says, “PMCs may have a legitimate role in helping weak governments to secure revenue streams, for example by protecting border points and highways” (paragraph 67). This may require the use of firearms.

- (l) We recommend that the Government give very careful consideration to imposing a ban on all recruitment by PMCs for combat operations and other activities, which are illegal under United Kingdom law. We further recommend that the Government consider the practicality of a complete ban on recruitment for such activities of United Kingdom citizens by overseas-based or offshore PMCs (paragraph 114).

The Government will consider this recommendation. It might be possible to address the issue as part of a regulatory regime. The question of the relation of any regulatory regime to existing UK law such as the 1870 Foreign Enlistment Act would require careful consideration.

- (m) We recommend that, to prevent the inappropriate use of knowledge gained through employment in the British armed forces, the Government examine whether restrictions should be placed on former British service personnel who wish to move into related activity in the private sector, such as a ‘cooling off’ period similar to that which applies to former civil servants and government advisers (paragraph 115).

The principles governing the acceptance of business appointments by officers of the Crown Service after leaving the Services are already covered in the Queen’s Regulations for each of the three Services. The regulations state that “before accepting, within two years of leaving the Service, an offer of employment, all officers must obtain the approval of the Ministry of Defence. An officer of or above the rank of Rear-Admiral, Major-General or Air Vice Marshal must obtain approval to take up any paid employment whether or not with a defence contractor or foreign government”. This procedure is necessary to ensure that when an officer accepts outside employment there should not be cause for suspicion of impropriety.

- (n) We recommend that each contract for a military/security operation overseas should be subject to a separate licence, with the exception of companies engaged in the provision of non-contentious services for whom the Government considers a general licence would suffice (paragraph 123).

The Government will consider this. Any regulatory regime would need to strike a balance between covering what needs to be covered, and avoiding unnecessary burdens on the private sector.

- (o) We recommend that the Government consider carefully how to ensure that a licensing regime allows companies to operate with the necessary speed without compromising the effectiveness of the vetting process (paragraph 124).

The Government agrees that this would be a key issue for any regulatory regime.

- (p) Despite private military companies’ concerns about client confidentiality, we conclude that the need to ensure that the sector is properly regulated overrides the private interests of PMCs and their clients (paragraph 126).

For any regulatory regime to be successful disclosure would be necessary, but a balance would need to be struck between the need for informed decision making and client confidentiality.

- (q) We recommend that the Government should consider whether exemptions to the project-specific licensing procedure described above should apply with respect to contracts with trusted organizations of which the United Kingdom is a member, such as NATO, the United Nations or the European Union and with responsible governments (paragraph 129).

The Government agrees that this could be a useful component of any regulatory regime. It would reduce the regulatory burden, and encourage legitimate business.

- (r) We recommend that private military and security companies be required to obtain a general licence before undertaking any permitted military/security activities overseas (paragraph 134).

The Government will consider this recommendation.

- (s) We recommend that, as part of the application procedure for registration, private military companies be required to disclose to the Government in some detail the company structures, the experience of permanent personnel, recruitment policies, and other relevant information (paragraph 135).

The Government will consider carefully the information disclosure that would be necessary for an effective regime.

- (t) We conclude that a voluntary code is insufficient to regulate the private military industry, because it would not enable the Government to prevent the activities of disreputable companies which were detrimental to the United Kingdom's interests (paragraph 137).

The Government notes this conclusion, and notes that some private military companies have also suggested a voluntary code. It considers that it would in any case be in the interests of reputable private military companies to draw up a voluntary code of conduct. Adherence to this code could become a factor in any decisions taken under a regulatory regime.

- (u) Given the costs inherent in regulating the private sector to perform the tasks discussed in this Report, we recommend that the Government weigh these costs carefully against the option of developing a publicly funded armed service cadre to provide on a commercial basis the tasks currently being undertaken by PMCs (paragraph 141).

The Government will consider this. There would be risks inherent in setting up an operation which might be seen as amounting to a publicly owned PMC.

- (v) We conclude that improving controls over the trafficking and brokering of arms would curb some of the most damaging activities of private military companies. We further conclude that, because of improved international intelligence cooperation since the terrorist attacks of 11 September, policing such controls should be possible. We recommend that the Government apply extra-territorial jurisdiction to the brokering and trafficking of arms at the earliest opportunity (paragraph 149).

The Export Control Act 2002 contains a new general power allowing controls to be imposed on trafficking and brokering in arms and other sensitive equipment. Controls may be imposed under the Act in relation to trafficking and brokering activities carried out by persons in the UK or by any UK person overseas.

The Government has proposed to use the new Act to control trafficking and brokering in military equipment to any destination, where any relevant part of the activity takes place in the United Kingdom. The Government has also proposed to use the new power extra-territorially to control trafficking and brokering in military equipment to embargoed destinations, and trafficking and brokering in equipment used for torture (the export of which is already banned) and in long-range missiles to any destination. Trafficking and brokering of this latter kind is subject to widespread international condemnation and the Government believes that UK persons living overseas may reasonably be expected to know that such activities would be likely to constitute an offence.

The Government expects that the Export Control Act and the new controls to be introduced under it, including those on arms trafficking and brokering, will come into force during the second half of 2003.

- (w) We recommend that any prospective regulatory regime for private military companies be co-ordinated with the Government's existing export controls, to ensure that arms used by a PMC in fulfilment of a contract do not remain in a country subject to embargo (paragraph 150).

The Government agrees that a degree of co-ordination with existing export controls would be desirable. However any regulatory regime for PMCs would not absolve them from the provisions of arms export control legislation, including the observance of arms embargoes.

- (x) We recommend that the Government consider establishing an informal appraisal and complaints mechanism, which would operate through consultations between UK officials in posts and the organizations operating alongside PMCs in the field (paragraph 153).

The Government would expect posts to report on the operations of PMCs as necessary as part of their normal business, and pass on any complaints. But any regulatory regime should include a formal complaints procedure.

- (y) We recommend that the Government establish as an integral part of any regulatory system an appropriate monitoring and evaluation regime, and make full co-operation with that regime a condition of the granting of licences to PMCs (paragraph 157).

The Government will consider this.

- (z) We conclude that procedures similar to those for Parliamentary scrutiny of arms export licences should apply to any regulation of PMCs, with prior parliamentary scrutiny being applied to any licence applications that might involve PMCs in provision of armed combat services (paragraph 160).

The Government agrees that scrutiny procedures for any regulatory regime should be consistent with those for arms export licences.

- (aa) We recommend that the Government consider very carefully how to ensure that the benefits of permitting a regulated private military sector to operate from the United Kingdom are not outweighed by the costs of establishing and maintaining a regime for their regulation (paragraph 163).

The Government considers that the balance between the costs of a regulatory regime and the costs and benefits of the activities of PMCs lies at the heart of the issue.
